Vitella grew up in the Italian colony of Luceria in the middle of the Second Punic War or Hannibalic War. What was to her simply "the War" dominated her life. She lost her father, She saw her house wrecked, the crops were destroyed, the sheep she cared for in the absence of grown men were slaughtered, and worst of all the family was continually threatened and terrorized by a enemy made demonic and superhuman by fears and rumors.

She took up the use of weapons originally to defend the sheep, and her success at driving off a wolf encouraged her to fantasize greater deeds. She participated in the transport of Consul Nero's army to the Metaurus for a great victory. On the way back, she met a battered Carthaginian prisoner named Maharbal and found him human, not demonic. Suddenly, the War was no longer simple.

But Roman steel wins out over softer feelings, and Vitella planned to use her invisibility as a woman to slip into Hannibal's camp and assassinate the Carthaginian commander. Quickly, she ran into unexpected obstacles-- desolate countryside, drenching rain, feral dogs, and equally feral humans. She was rescued by the Carthaginian officer, Maharbal. He took her into his tent and his heart as his informal wife with no idea of what was in her mind. Undeterred, she continues her plans of assassination and comes surprisingly close to carrying them out. But she was out of her depth in taking on a much stronger, better trained, and extremely experienced warrior. She was foiled and at Hannibal's mercy. She had even caused trouble for Maharbal. What had she gotten herself into, and was there any way out short of execution?
